Well, it is official. President Donald Trump is making another run at the White House in 2024. In front of a crowd at his home in Mar-a-Lago, Trump gave a speech in which he excoriated the ineptitude of the Biden administration while striking a hopeful message for the future.

There can be no doubt that Trump's speech has already caused immense triggering on the left. Indeed, The Washington Post published an article titled "Trump, who as president fomented an insurrection, says he is running again" during the former president's speech.

During his speech, Trump reminded the audience of the prosperity America enjoyed under his presidency. He said:

“The world was at peace, America was prospering, and our country was on track for an amazing future because I made big promises to the American people. And unlike other presidents, I kept my promises...under our leadership, we were a great and glorious nation, something you haven’t heard for quite a long period of time. We were a strong nation, and importantly, we were a free nation.”

By way of contrast, Trump noted how the nation is faring under President Joe Biden. He painted quite a bleak picture:

“But now we are a nation in decline. We are a failing nation. For millions of Americans, the past two years under Joe Biden have been a time of pain, hardship, anxiety, and despair. As we speak, inflation is the highest in over 50 years. Gas prices have reached the highest levels in history, and expect them to go much higher now that the strategic national reserves, which I filled up, have been virtually drained.”

Trump also touched on foreign policy, noting that “the United States has been embarrassed, humiliated, and weakened for all to see,” and said Russia’s invasion of Ukraine “would have never happened if I were your president.”

The president later cast a vision for the future he envisions for the country and that “this will not be my campaign – this will be our campaign, all together.” He declared that “the only force strong enough to defeat the massive corruption we are up against is you, the American people.”

He drew another contrast between himself and the current administration, pointing out that the Biden administration “put America last,” but that “we will again put America first.”

Trump addressed a slew of issues, including the migrant crisis, energy dependence, China, and the Green New Deal, promising to provide solutions for each of these issues if he became president again. He also promised to rescind the Biden administration’s COVID policies and rehire every member of the military who was fired due to the restrictions.

All in all, the president did precisely what he needed to do in this speech. He brought attention to the many flaws of the Biden administration while explaining what he would do to rectify the problems it has created.

But what was most notable was what Trump did not say.

At no point in his speech did he bring up the outcome of the 2020 presidential election, an issue the left has seized on to attack him and other Republicans who question the fairness of the race. Perhaps it is a sign that he realizes this is not a winning issue for him for folks outside of his base. (At least for now it isn’t – but what happens when voters realize what happened to them in 2020 happened to them again in 2022?)

In other words, he struck the right tone. There was none of the usual bombastic rhetoric and insults that are typically mainstays of his rallies. He was energetic but subdued – in a word, presidential.

Now, only a week after the midterms, the 2024 campaign season has begun, and it is clear this will be a hard-fought battle.

Better strap in, because if this speech was any indication, America is in for quite a ride over the next two years. Let's hope it's a ride we enjoy.
